EnergyPrint hires Brian Walsh as business systems analyst

Minneapolis - EnergyPrint (www.EnergyPrint.com), a leading innovator of online energy management and reporting tools, has named Brian Walsh as business systems analyst. He will be responsible for identifying new features for EnergyPrint's tools and optimizing existing function and security for users.

Prior to joining EnergyPrint, Walsh worked with Fortune 500 corporations, including Microsoft Corporation, IBM and Goodrich Corporation, to implement and manage their creative IT solutions and administration.

EnergyPrint specializes in the development and use of web-based software technologies that help property owners and managers get their arms around their largest and fastest-growing operating expense — energy.

— Brian brings great enthusiasm, drive and technology expertise to our nationally growing company, — said Priscilla Koeckeritz, EnergyPrint's president and CEO. — His expertise will be invaluable as our platform and its benefits continue to scale. —

Walsh has a bachelor's degree in computer science and business administration from Jamestown College, and an MBA from North Dakota State University.

Founded in September 2009, St. Paul-based EnergyPrint is a leading developer of web-based applications for building professionals. EnergyPrint's industry-unique suite of energy insights provides energy data management services to help measure and evaluate whole-building energy consumption, allowing management to take control over their building expenses. The company currently benchmarks buildings in nearly 40 states.
